What is an Ecosystem? An ecosystem is the combination of a group of plants and animals together with their physical environment. Each part of an ecosystem is in some way interlinked with the others. For example, a forest is an ecosystem: the birds, earthworms, trees and other plants and animals in a forest interact with each other for food, shelter and reproduction, and rely on rainfall and the health of the soil (the physical environment) for their

is there a difference between "biodiversity conservation" and "nature conservation"? No. They mean the same thing - that is, to protect and look after our natural environment and all the plants and animals living in them.

Why is it important to protect biodiversity? The biodiversity of the Pacific islands is unique, with many plant and animal species found nowhere else in the world. This biodiversity is valuable to people's livelihoods, their economies and their well-being, and has become an integral part of island cultures and traditions. Many species of plants and animals are disappearing because of human activities and some are at risk because of the impacts of climate change and natural disasters. Investing in efforts to conserve these valuable resources will help ensure the long-term survival and well-being of our Pacific island environment and our people.
